WHAT IS ORGANISATIONAL AND INSTITUTIONAL STUDIES?

Organisational and Institutional Studies (OIS) is a new programme in the School of Social Sciences coordinated by the Public Affairs Research Institute. The programme offers ways to understand organisations and institutions of government and a multidisciplinary approach to the study of the state and civil society.

The study of institutions can unlock many of the central political challenges facing nations across the globe.

In South Africa, where the various approaches to studying institutions have developed unevenly, this programme brings together insights from the fields of Political Science, Sociology, Economics and Anthropology to provide in-depth observation and analysis of how institutions shape power dynamics and impact major political outcomes.

PARI Public Affairs Research Institute

PARI has pioneered the field of organisational and institutional studies in South Africa. Employing ethnographic and historical methodologies it works inside government and civil society organisations to understand where power lies in these organisations and how it is exercised, in order to develop recommendations for improved governance, accountability and organisational performance. In recognition of the originality and importance of this work the University of the Witwatersrand has established a new field of study in Institutional Studies.

The Institute contributes to academic debate on the nature of the state and state-society relations through participating in and hosting local and international conferences, and publishing in peer-reviewed journals and books.

A limited number of scholarships will be offered. Only successful applicants will be eligible.
